We showed that the cumulative recurrence rates of patients were similar among different clinical stages, and the recurrent sites and times were not different. The overall recurrence rates of CCRCC patients without specific treatment in our study were slightly higher than those of CCRCC patients with treatment, but without a statistically significant difference. The recurrence rates in a short follow-up time in patients who underwent complete surgical resection were higher than those of patients who underwent incomplete surgical resection. In the present study, six patients had multiple tumors. If a patient had multiple tumors at the same site, the time to recurrence for these lesions was not statistically significantly different, and the distribution of recurrence sites was not different. Therefore, only the first tumor of a patient was analyzed. The difference in the recurrence of multiple tumors among these patients was not statistically significant. However, as this was only a retrospective analysis, further prospective studies are required to determine whether patients with multiple renal cell carcinoma should undergo nephrectomy after nephron-sparing surgery. This study had several limitations. First, our study only included a small number of patients. Therefore, the results may not be representative of all CCRCC patients. Second, as our study was retrospective, 2d92ce491b
