In this study, the use of nacre-inspired micropatterned polyurethane (PU) and self-assembled poly(allylamine hydrochloride) (PAH) as a versatile template for the fabrication of biomimetic polymer nanocomposites was demonstrated. The use of surface micropatterns based on a self-assembled monolayer of amine groups and bovine plasma fibronectin (bFn) as a substrate for cell growth was examined by seeding onto nacre-inspired micropatterned PU and PAH surfaces and in comparison with bFn, polystyrene (PS) and polydimethylsiloxane (PDMS). The findings demonstrated that the nacre-inspired PU and PAH micropatterned surfaces as well as the bFn coating were able to support human fibroblast cells and human mesenchymal stem cells as well as murine macrophage cells. Moreover, the ability of the bFn coated surfaces to support cell attachment and proliferation compared favorably with the surface properties of a PS control as well as a PDMS control. The findings demonstrated that the nanostructured PU and PAH biomimetic polymers can be a strong candidate for use as biocompatible materials for the generation of functional surfaces in bioengineering. not function in the area under investigation. A source from the Pyongyang regime said that “the nuclear test is a major event” that will signal the regime’s independence from the United States. According to South Korean researchers, North Korea is expected to conduct an underground nuclear test sometime between 2013 and 2016. Reuters cites South Korean intelligence official Kim Min-seok as saying that the UN inspectors may be sent to an undisclosed location in the northeastern part of North Korea for the investigation. North Korea’s nuclear program is widely believed to be one of the largest, least understood, and potentially most disruptive in the world.[Short-term effects 2d92ce491b
