Jun 18, 2012 Mydac FULL Version Download 1 furnavyki.A powerful nonlinear circuit has been devised to protect sensitive circuitry from noise and signal overloading. The circuit is called "bootstrapping" and is a device that passes an input signal through a number of amplifiers, each with an input stage, to provide an output signal at the same level as the input signal. Each amplifier is connected in series with each adjacent amplifier so that the input signal is amplified in each amplifier by a small amount. At the output of the last amplifier, an inverter device is used to invert the output signal to return it to the same level as the input signal. The system works by using the fact that the output of a nonlinear amplifier, such as a bipolar transistor or a FET, can be linearized by adding a small signal at a frequency twice the signal to be amplified, and passing the two signals through an inverter. In other words, the bootstrapping circuit applies an inverting buffer to a small signal and a signal that is twice the small signal amplitude to cancel the small signal and enhance the larger signal. For the most part, this bootstrapping circuit does not produce a signal twice the level of the signal being amplified. However, the bootstrapping circuit operates at high frequency if the bootstrapping gain is large, resulting in increased power dissipation. More specifically, if the bootstrapping gain is a, and if the frequency of the input signal is f, the device is in resonance with an equivalent circuit of a transformer (sometimes referred to as "T" mode), having a primary inductance of L1 and a secondary inductance of L 3ef4e8ef8d
