RR Senior Engineer in Charge. Serum, urine and kidney are the major target organs of advanced glycation end products (AGEs). The review article cites several publications discussing the distribution of advanced glycation end products (AGEs) in human tissues. It is briefly discussed that accumulation of the AGEs is a progressive process, in which the accumulation in the tissues occur in a non-linear manner. Distribution of the modified non-specific cross-link MG-H1 in human tissues is also reviewed. The proposed molecular chaperone role of AGEs is also discussed. Serum and urine concentrations of the AGEs are very high and >85-90% of the AGEs is in the globulins. An important compartment of the serum AGEs is in the albumin fraction. Other authors have suggested that kidney is the major target organ. New reports for distribution of AGEs in liver and kidney is also reviewed. Effect of oxygen therapy on blood and liver ATP in sows; preliminary investigation. The effect of oxygen therapy on blood and liver ATP levels in sows was investigated. Sows of different parity received an infusion of 5 ml/kg Ringer's lactate (R) or R supplemented with oxygen (15% O<sub>2</sub>). Samples were taken from sows at different times up to 3 h after the start of the infusion and blood lactate was measured. The lactate level decreased significantly after the infusion of O<sub>2</sub>-supplemented R. Liver ATP was then measured after separating each liver into an inner and
